AUTUMN 2019

Taking the long view on your investments?

Holding steady in volatile times

The lasting power of peace of mind

More people are now setting up Lasting Powers of Attorney (LPAs), not just those in later life.

Often written alongside a will, these important legal documents allow you to appoint one or more trusted representatives or 'attorneys' to take charge of your finances and/or welfare if you are unable to look after your own affairs at some point in the future.

The growing use of LPAs is hardly surprising given the ageing population, but it is a mistake to think that they are just for the elderly. Anyone over the age of 18 can set up an LPA – after all, accidents or illness can occur at any point in life.

In England and Wales there are two types of LPA – one covering health and welfare and another for property and financial affairs. You can set up either or both types and appoint the same or different attorneys for each one. For LPAs to be legally valid, they need to be signed, witnessed and registered with the Office of the Public Guardian, which costs £82 for each LPA. In Scotland, Powers of Attorney are slightly different.

Property and financial affairs LPAs are not just for people with substantial assets. At the simplest level, they can allow your designated attorney to access your bank account and ensure that essential bills get paid.

When it comes to choosing an attorney, you can pick a spouse, partner, relative or friend or even a professional, such as a local solicitor, although remember that they are likely to charge for this service. The stipulations are that your attorney must be over 18 and mentally capable of making decisions for themselves. Bankrupt individuals cannot be appointed for financial LPAs.

LPAs do not automatically give attorneys immediate access to your finances. In fact, you have to give express permission before an attorney can use the powers granted under a property and financial affairs LPA, although it can be used as soon as it has been registered. You have to be deemed mentally incapable of making your own decisions before a health and welfare LPA can take effect, for example, if you have dementia or are in a coma after a car crash.

People often choose to set up an LPA when they are writing their will. Many LPAs are never put into effect, but having one can provide peace of mind that a trusted friend or relative would look after your affairs if your health failed.

In this issue...

To say we're living in interesting times may feel like an understatement. It's almost impossible to avoid the headlines whether you focus on Brexit, international markets or climate change. But can that focus actually harm your long-term investment strategy? Recent research has shown almost three-quarters of investors are influenced by short-term political developments. However, as our feature explores, taking a long-term view may be more productive for your portfolio, and less stressful. We also investigate some developments on inheritance tax which could have important implications for your estate planning. And for those sending children to university this autumn, a report on the structure of student finances could play a role in future funding. With additional pieces on pension contributions and cash flow planning into retirement, that long-term view may work in more ways than one.

TAX

Simplifying the inheritance tax rules

Istock/GlobalStock

Major changes to inheritance tax (IHT) are proposed by the government's Office of Tax Simplification (OTS) which could alter your estate planning.

Inheritance tax is certainly complicated – especially for a tax that generates relatively little revenue. The OTS has spent some 18 months looking at it and has now produced two linked reports. The second and more important one, dealing with the structure of the tax, was published in July 2019, just as the man who commissioned it, Chancellor Phillip Hammond, was about to leave office.

The latest OTS report contains a wide range of proposals that could have a big effect on your estate planning. These include:

- You should only have to live for five years – not seven, as now – before a lifetime gift ceases to be subject to IHT. At the same time, the little-understood taper relief should also be abolished. This can reduce the amount of tax payable on lifetime gifts made more than three years before death, but it applies to relatively few estates.
- The rules for IHT business property relief (BPR) should be brought in line with those for capital gains tax (CGT), which would result in fewer businesses qualifying for the relief. Alongside this change, the CGT rules at death should be reformed.
- The current £3,000 annual exemption and the marriage/civil partnership exemption (up to £5,000 for parents) should be replaced with a new single 'personal gifts allowance'. The OTS made no specific recommendation but it pointed out that the annual exemption would now be worth just under £12,000 if it had been inflation-proofed since its last increase.
- The level of the small gifts exemption (originally set at £250 in 1980) should be reconsidered. Again, the OTS made no specific recommendation but it did say that inflation-linking would have increased the amount to just over £1,000.
- The rules for normal expenditure gifts should be reformed or should be replaced by a higher personal gifts allowance. This exemption is potentially valuable, but according to the OTS is regarded as confusing, difficult to claim and often not included in planning.
- Pay-outs under term assurance policies should be free of IHT. Currently, it is necessary to write such contracts under trust to keep them out of the policyholder's estate on death.

The latest OTS report contains a wide range of proposals that could have a big effect on your estate planning.

Philip Hammond responded to the report by saying that "The government will consider the recommendations...and will respond in due course" The new Chancellor Sajid Javid will probably echo his view, although in the short term his priorities are likely revolve around Brexit.

Like most reforms, the OTS proposals would create winners and losers. To understand which category you would fall into, and any pre-emptive actions that can be taken with your financial planning, please talk to us.

INVESTMENTS

Taking the long view on your investments?

Trade wars between the US and China, as well as Brexit and tensions in various parts of the world have all made markets more volatile in recent months. Unsurprisingly, private investors have become more nervous.

A recent survey by leading investment house Schroders revealed that almost three-quarters of UK investors said they were influenced by political developments and market movements and checked their investments at least monthly. Nearly one in five investors said that they were waiting for the dust to settle before making investment decisions.

So is it the wisest choice to allow political uncertainties and market swings to colour your investment judgements?

FIVE-YEAR PLANS

Most investment experts agree that five years is the minimum period that an investor should expect to hold share or bond-based funds. And the longer the holding period, the more likely it is that funds invested in shares will outperform cash deposits or bonds – although there is no certainty that this will happen.

Over five years or more, most of the headline-grabbing news normally fades away or is overtaken by other events. The value of taking a longer-term approach is well illustrated in the table on page 5 from the latest Barclays Equity Gilt Study, published earlier this year. This shows the probability of UK shares outperforming UK government bonds (gilts) and cash (as measured by Treasury Bills) over various consecutive periods between two and ten years, based on real data tracking between 1900 and the end of 2018.

For example, UK shares outperformed cash deposits in nearly three-quarters (73%) of four-year periods over the 118 years; and shares outperformed cash in over nine out of ten periods of ten years.

Just over the past five-year period from the start of 2014 to the end of 2018, the UK experienced two general elections, two

Homing in on capital gains

Draft legislation confirms a further tightening of the rules on capital gains tax and your home.

The government has been reforming the tax system to make investment in residential property less attractive. Actions have included increasing stamp duty land tax (mirrored in Scotland and Wales), reducing tax relief for mortgage interest and, from next tax year, creating a 30-day time limit for paying capital gains tax (CGT) on any residential property sale profits.

There will be two further new changes from April next year:

- A reduction in the 'final period exemption'. This is the period in which no CGT applies to a former main residence, and it will be halved to nine months in most circumstances. a problem if you buy your new home before selling your old one.
- Letting relief, which exempts up to £40,000 of gain from tax, will only be available if the owner remains in shared occupancy with the tenant. So it won't apply where the owner moves out.

The government's explanatory note says that "These changes are intended to make private residence relief fairer and...better targets... reliefs at owner occupiers, in line with broader tax strategy to promote home ownership".

If you are thinking of moving home but retaining your current property, both measures provide food for thought.

“ A very small number of days have historically generated a surprisingly large proportion of total long-term returns. ”

Of course, stock markets can fall and sometimes they can drop very quickly. But the rebounds from falls can also happen quickly and are likewise hard to predict. A very small number of days have historically generated a surprisingly large proportion of total long-term returns. Over the last 30 years to 2018, about 0.2% of days generate roughly half of total performance.

So if you come out of the market, you could be missing out on key growth moments. For example, the US stock market as represented by the S&P 500 index of large companies had an overall market return of 1,000% over the 30 years to 2018. Removing the 10 best days would halve the performance to just 500%. It is a similar story with the European Stoxx 600 - the less stellar long-term performance of a 470% increase over 30 years would have been halved by leaving out the 10 best days on which the market moved upwards the most.

Ignoring the short-term noise in favour of paying attention to longer-term developments has two other benefits:

- Your investment turnover will be lower, reducing overall costs; and
- You can stop worrying unnecessarily about the daily changes in investment values.

✦ The value of your investments, and the income from them, can go down as well as up and you may not get back the full amount you invested.

Time for a university fees shake-up?

A review of post-18 education in England has put student financing under the spotlight yet again – and could be the subject of another bout of reform.

The review was partly in response to growing criticism of the level of university tuition fees. But it also comes as new National Statistics methods mean that student financing will soon account for a substantially larger proportion of the national debt.

Fees vary throughout the four constituent parts of the UK, with England having the highest overall. English students will pay up to £9,250 wherever they study in the UK, unless they go to Wales, in which case the maximum is £9,000. Scottish students studying in Scotland remain free of tuition fees, while those from Northern Ireland who stay home only pay £4,160.

The review, chaired by Dr Philip Augar, suggested several major reforms. While these focused on the system in England, they could well prompt a response from other parts of the UK as well.

- The cap on university tuition fees should be reduced to £7,500 a year by 2021/22, frozen for 2022/23 and then should be inflation-linked from 2023/24.

- For new students from 2021/22, the annual income threshold at which loans start to be repaid should be cut from £25,000 to £23,000 (in 2018/19 values). The loan repayment rate should remain at 9% of income above the threshold.

- The maximum repayment term for new students should be extended from 30 to 40 years.

- A cap should be put on lifetime repayments at 120% of the initial loan amount, adjusted for inflation.

- Means-tested maintenance grants should be reintroduced and the eligibility thresholds revalued in line with inflation.

A surprising consequence of the proposals is that the total repaid by the highest-earning graduates would be less than under the current rules. But those on 'middle of the range' graduate earnings could end up paying a lot more as a result of the ten-year extension of the repayment term.

These proposals would change important aspects of student financing, but most graduates would still start their working lives with a substantial amount of inflation-linked debt. Some will end their working lives 40 years' later in a similar situation.

If you have children or grandchildren heading for university in the coming years, you should factor their education costs into your planning.

PENSIONS

Workplace pensions - good start but not enough

This October marks the seventh anniversary of the start of workplace pension auto-enrolment, perhaps proving that some grand government schemes can be a success.

T There was much scepticism when the first phase of automatic enrolment into workplace pensions began in October 2012 – an earlier attempt to encourage workplace provision through the launch of stakeholder pensions had been a failure. After the initial phase focused on the largest employers, there was doubt around how small and micro-employers would handle the administrative burden.

INCREASED PARTICIPATION

As it turned out auto-enrolment has hugely increased the number of people in workplace pensions. Back in 2012, before the start of the initiative, only about four out of ten eligible private sector employees were members of workplace pension arrangements.

By April 2018, nearly nine out of ten eligible employees were workplace pension members (85% in the private sector, 93% in the public sector), according to recently issued figures from the Department for Work and Pensions (DWP). A sharp rise in the minimum level of overall contributions from April 2018 does not appear to have dented employee enthusiasm. Another minimum contribution increase took effect from this April, seemingly with similar acceptance, although there are no firm figures yet.

CONTRIBUTION GAP

Pension contributions for employees are still too low however and need to be increased, as the government acknowledged in a review issued in late 2017. The review suggested that around 12 million people were “under-saving for their retirement”, with most of those under-savers earning more than £25,000 a year.

Higher earners are more likely to be not contributing enough because there is no longer any earnings-related element to the state pension. The new flat rate state pension introduced in April 2016 (£168.60 a week in 2019/20) represents a smaller proportion of earnings at retirement for those on higher pay.

However auto-enrolment has left one sector of the working population untouched – the self-employed. Their numbers have been growing rapidly – think gig economy – to the point where they account for about 15% of the UK labour force in 2017. Yet pension participation among the self-employed has fallen. According to the DWP, “the self-employed group has seen a continuous decline in [pension] participation from 27% in 2008/09 to 15% in 2017/18”.

MEETING THE GOALS

The government will probably find some mechanism to raise minimum contributions again, although this may not happen until the middle of the next decade.

Meanwhile:

- If you are an employer, remember that every three years, or earlier if they meet certain criteria, you must re-enrol any employees who have left your pension scheme.
- If you are an employee, talk to us about whether you need to pre-empt that contribution increase to meet your retirement goals.

■ If you are self-employed, make sure that you are not among the 85% who do not contribute into a pension.

Mind the insurance gender gap

Women generally insure themselves for much smaller sums than men, although both buy life insurance and critical illness cover in roughly equal numbers.

The average level of cover for a man's life insurance policy is around £130,000, but only around £85,000 for women's policies, according to an analysis of policies by software company IRESS. The gap is even larger with critical illness policies, which pay out if you are diagnosed with one of the listed critical conditions. Here, the average cover taken out by women is, around half the average cover for men.

On average, women earn less than men, by about 10% according to the latest gender pay gap figures. But that isn't enough to explain the huge difference in levels of cover, which indicate that women seem at higher risk of being under-insured than men.

Insurance experts say couples tend to buy more life insurance for the higher-earner. But both partners should have adequate protection — most families depend on two incomes and a reasonably equal share of childcare.

PLANNING

Future-proofing your retirement finances

The unknowns in your financial outlook can always shift, especially when you come up to retirement.

One of the best tools for looking at the future is using long-term cash flow planning to project your expenditure and the income you'll need to meet it. You may not be able or wish to continue working to shore up against future financial challenges, so estimating your likely expenditure before considering your potential sources of income and capital over the coming years is a good place to start.

CHARTING EXPENDITURE

Balancing this equation becomes even more important as you think about how stopping or reducing work will impact on your lifestyle and spending habits. Housing is a major issue. You may have paid off your mortgage, but you might want to move to another property or even another area or country.

For many people, early retirement is a time for high activity levels in terms of travel, social life and pursuing interests; later this might reduce as they decide to take life easier.

Your expected levels of expenditure will vary as these assumptions change. It helps to define your expenditure as core and essential – such as utility bills which are unavoidable – and what could be dropped if the financial resources were not there to cover it, such as eating out regularly.

MAPPING INCOME SOURCES

The other side of the picture is assessing the income and capital resources with which to meet your expected outgoings. These could include earnings from work, state and other pensions and rental income, as well as total returns from savings and investments. It makes sense to explore a range of scenarios for investment performance across your different sources of income. Projections can range from the very positive to the more pessimistic.

The actual cash flow projections will map these potential expenditure and income outcomes to show whether you are likely to have a deficit or a surplus over your expected lifetime.

For a surplus, you might want to consider whether to increase your expenditure, which could include making gifts to your family. A deficit forecast may mean you should reconsider your spending plans and see where you can make cost savings. If you have the choice, you might want to rethink your retirement date and focus on additional pension or other saving.

It is hardly surprising that long-term cash flow modelling has grown into one of the most valuable tools for financial planning.

✦ The value of your investments, and the income from them, can go down as well as up and you may not get back the full amount you invested.

Past performance is not a reliable indicator of future performance.

Investing in shares should be regarded as a long-term investment and should fit with your overall attitude to risk and financial circumstances.
